With twenty-five years of research and design experience, Margaret has deeply rooted success in creating high-performance workplaces that address space utilization, employee engagement, and workplace productivity. Her national reputation as a workplace strategist is a result of the effective, fast, data-driven process she developed and uses successfully for leading corporate, government, academic, and institutional organizations across the US. Margaret received her PhD in Workplace Culture and Behavior, spent fifteen years of practice as an architect and interior designer, then became Herman Miller's National Workplace Strategist for ten years before founding her independent workplace consulting firm. Margaret's work is regularly published, she teaches workplace design at the university level, and is in high demand as a speaker on workplace strategy at major corporate real estate, higher education and laboratory conferences.
